

Kile Adumene, M.Ed., RN, brings a wealth of lived and professional experience as a Black-immigrant and highly skilled community organizer who understands the importance of building the capacity of others to organize for themselves and their communities. As a working mother of four wonderful children, she has tirelessly worked to build out a range of programs mostly focused on health equity issues as well as leadership development programs to support Black, brown, and people of color community members as they navigate their leadership and work in a predominantly white and rural state. She brings a mix of lived and professional experience working in philanthropy, community development, and grassroots organizing focused on race, health, and economic justice issues across rural geographies as well as a unique skill set and professional experiences within economic development and community organizing.

Kile is currently directing a community-led initiative called Manchester Community Action Coalition, an organization that provides a safe space for the marginalized (Black, Brown, Indigenous, Immigrant, POC, Disability, LGBTQUIA+) community in Manchester, NH to discuss, share, and discover needs within the community. Additionally, she has worked in various healthcare facilities in New Hampshire since 2000, lived in Manchester for over 20 years, and an Adjunct Faculty Instructor at Southern New Hampshire University.
